Mr. Doubleday alone knew the secret.
He had received it on the telephone, and it had made livid his pale, tired face. There was a moment when he could have screamed, so painful was the tension of his nerves. He saw her often; he does not know that his eidest child has gone out of life. That is her triumph, But to her it is not a triumph. She has to think of telling Mr. Kipling why he is not to see Josephine again. When is it to be told to him? Mr. Doubleday, at the suggestion of that unenviable duty, let his arms fall desperately.

His system of education for her was to let her do all that she wished and to give her all that she desired. He abstained only from permitting her to hear lies and stupidities. His little Josephine would be divinely good, be-cause the persons that she knew were good, and intelligent, and instructive, ************ many gowns, pink, green, sky blue, white, lilac, and as many hats as a listle princess of the fairy tales might have possessed. Mr. Kipling wanted his daughter to be as charmingly attired as the heroines of the tales that be invented for her. tired as the heroines of the tales that he invented for her. She inspired him. He knew very well that in Homer's "bloomin' lyre" children had no place. There was, in the Iliad only the incident of Hector frightening his son with the plume of his helmet and taking it off in order to press the child in his arms. But Mr. Kipling did not want to be a classic epic poet. He worshiped children in literature as in life. He adored little Josephine. He was her best playmate.

Only women understand children "Only women understand children thoroughly," he wrote; "but if a mero man keeps very quiet and humbles himself properly, and refrains from talking down to his superiors, the children will sometimes be good to him and let him see what they think about the world. But, even after patient in-vestigation and the condescension of the nursery, it is hard to draw babies correctly.
